Maj. W. Evans Gordon in World's Work. England, of course-and America as well -attracts foreign elements from all parts of the globe. If a line be drawn from Kustenjeh, on the Black sea, to Libau, on the Baltic, and another from Kalisch, in Poland, to the easternmost point of the province of Ekaterinoslav, in Russia, these lines will traverse the length and breath of the vast area from which comes a mass of immigrants whom the English and remote villages in the provinces of Minsk and Tchernigov, all send their quota to swell the ever rising tide. As a member of the royal commission on alien immigration I have thought it most important to investigate this question on the spot, and accordingly I spent the last parliamentary recess in visiting the homes of all our different aliens. I propose to tell

American population must assimilate. Eng-and many thousands yearly pass the test of the immigration laws of the United States. The slums of Vilna and Warsaw, the ghettos of Lemberg and Galatz, the

here exactly what I found.
I reached Dvinsk, my first halting place in the Russian Pale, on a mournful rainy Saturday morning. The town is said to have $0,000 inhabitants, and some 70,000 are Jews. The persecuting May laws of 1882 drove many of these from the villages and smaller towns into the larger centers of population, hence the high proportion of Hebrews to be found in the place; hence also much of the misery and poverty from which these poor neonle suffer. The prewhich these poor people suffer. The pre-ponderance of the Jewish race was at once apparent, the Sabbath sending the whole place to sleep. Not a shop was open, not a stroke of business was being done. The only sign of life was in front of the synagogue; there a large crowd of decent looking folk were holding their church parade, promenading up and down.

Sunday in Dvinsk. On the next day, Sunday, I was able to see the town in its business dress, though the Russian law forbids the opening of shops by the Jews till 1 p.m. on the Christian day of rest. After that hour the markets were in full swing, crowded with country folk and soldiers from the cantonments near by. All were eagerly doing business with the Jews. A peculiar feature was that the soldiers were mostly sellers and the Jews buyers. Strips of embroidered Russian cloth, old boots, uniforms and a mass of miscellaneous odds and ends were the articles which the czar's "Tommies" had for sale. Every article was the sub-ject of a protracted bargain, and each group of soldiers in their white jackets and caps was surrounded by a crowd of Jews, in long, rusty black coats, with the characteristic stoop of the shoulders and flowing beards. Round the markets were many drinking and gambling dens and disorderly houses. No doubt the crowding of the Jewish population into the towns has led to a general deterioration both moral and physical. The struggle for life is a desperate business for many of them, and scruples diminish in proportion to its severity. The house accommodation is poor and squalid, but there is always light and air and space, and, considering Dvinsk from the purely residential point of view, I personally should prefer it to some streets I could name in towns at home. To those anxious to see for themselves what a Russian ghetto is like at its worst

I would recommend a visit to Vilna. There are said to be some 80,000 Jews here-not, by any means all poor. By far the greater part of the trade, and practically all the shops are in their hands. But the submerged tenth is submerged indeed.

The ghetto is a seething mass of humanity. Many of the streets and alleys are so arched gateways leading into court yards, around which the dens and cellars in which the people live are clustered.

I spent a whole day visiting them. In the corners of the court one would find a wooden trough into which all the refuse of the houses was thrown. The stench from these receptacles filled the whole air. The stucco walls were blistered and rotting, as if infected by the poisonous atmosphere within. Inside, the people were crowded pell mell, regardless of health, age or sex. In one room I found a lunatic in the mid-Sweet Chalybeate Springs, Va. dle of a family of young children. I was followed as I walked by a crowd of haggard, anxious, careworn people, staring at me with mournful eyes. Some openly beg-ged alms; others had trifles for sale. Many ged alms; others had trifles for sale. Many seemed to pass their time in the synagogues, rocking and chanting themselves into oblivion of their miseries. I came across several who had been to White-chapel, and had been sent back, I suppose, as fit for nothing. One man with a large family wished to make another trial of England, and asked me, of all people, for money to belight to get there.

money to help him to get there. Conditions in Pinsk. There are other towns, however, in the Pale where things are better. Pinsk is one of them. Here Jewish skill, labor and enterprise have been combined to good purpose. It is a picturesque place. The streets of wooden houses and cottages are lined with trees; there are a quaint old church and a seminary, and the river banks are full of life and color. The population is 40,000, of whom 37,000 are Jews. This disproportion, as in most of the towns of the Pale, would have resulted in congestion in all employments open to Hebrews had it not been for the energy and enterprise of certain leaders of the community, such as Messrs. Lourie and Halpern, who, by starting factories, have succeeded in profitably ing factories, have succeeded in profitably utilizing the labor of their coreligionists. In Mr. Halpern's match factory, for instance, Mr. Halpern's match factory, for instance, 1,500 hands are employed. In all there are eighteen factories in Pinsk, employing between 4,000 and 5,000 hands. If only similar industries could be started in other centers the great and tragic Jewish question in Russia would be well on the way to be solved. I am certain that the only true and permanent solution will be found on these lines. The idea that Jews will not engage in manual labor has long since been exploded.

In Pinsk there is plenty of poverty-the poverty which is common to all large towns in every country—but nothing hopeless or abnormal. The five thousand hands in regular employment leaven the mass, and the homes, though humble and very poor, still in several instances show signs of comfort and comparative presents. and comparative prosperity.

From Pinsk I made a tour into the interior of the country. I was anxious to see the condition of things in the small towns and villages. The enterprising Jews have started lines of steamers which ply on the

and villages. The enterprising Jews have started lines of steamers which ply on the numerous streams that intersect the country and add to the prosperity of the town. On one of them I took a passage.

It was a market day, and the river was crowded with primitive boats and dugout canoes laden with many kinds of produce. The Christian peasantry are engaged solely in agriculture; all other employments and handicrafts are conducted by Jews. Their capacity for business and organization is, on the whole, I think, a benefit to the peasantry. It is the Jews who find a market for the produce of the land, and every village and townlet in the Pale contains an agent or correspondent of the big exporting firms in Riga, Libau or Odessa. It is this elaborate organization which gives rise to the complaint so often heard in Russia that the Jews are the exploiters of the peasantry. I have no doubt that in many instances the moujiks do fall an easy prey to the superior intelligence and astuteness of their Hebrew brethren. At the same time, it is, I believe, a fact that the general condition of the Russian peasants in the region of their Hebrew brethren. At the same time, it is, I believe, a fact that the general condi-tion of the Russian peasants in the region where Jews are allowed to reside is superior to that which obtains outside the allotted
